4	The government currently provides some support for the unemployed, but it needs to do more because poverty remains a serious problem and many people lack sufficient skills to find new jobs.
	Although the government provides unemployment insurance, it only lasts for a limited time. If people are unable to rejoin the workforce quickly, their insurance will run out, leaving them and their families in poverty. Therefore, the government should extend the length of time for which people can receive unemployment insurance.
	Another serious issue for the unemployed is a lack of skills. In today's high-tech world, job training is therefore crucial. The government needs to provide or subsidize training that offers specific skills useful to job seekers.
	The safety net for people who lose their jobs is an essential part of society, and without more financial support and job training, there will be far too many people living in poverty.
