As with many endangered animals, the biggest threat to the wolves' survival has been the intrusion of humans into their territory. As settlers moved west across the United States, wolves were crowded into smaller and smaller areas. Food supplies also started to decrease, as humans hunted many of the animals on which wolves prey. However, what ultimately sent wolf populations spiraling downward was the widespread policy of aggressively hunting and killing the animals. Wolves were seen as a threat to people and livestock and were generally shot on sight.
