4	I do not think that young people should spend more time thinking about their future careers. First, schools already offer career education. For example, there are classes where students can learn about jobs and careers, and schools often invite guest speakers to talk about their experiences in society. Second, young people should try different kinds of jobs instead of only thinking about a future career. By experiencing these jobs, they can find what skills and abilities they have. In conclusion, I do not believe young people should spend a lot of time thinking about their future careers.
