The government should make a greater effort to encourage young people to vote in elections. I will explain from the perspectives of taxes and social responsibility.

First, young people are massively affected by tax policies. The short- and long-term economic impact of these policies is a key factor in how they plan for their futures. Voting in elections, therefore, ensures young people can influence the government to make the right decisions regarding the economy.

Moreover, strengthening social responsibility in the younger generation is important for the government. This is achieved by encouraging young people to participate in elections, which leads to a deeper appreciation of what is important for shaping their nation's future. In turn, this helps them to become more socially responsible citizens.

In conclusion, considering the benefits of better taxation policies for society and increased social responsibility, the government should do more to get young people to vote.
