Presently, Japanese consumers tend to prefer domestic brands over imported ones, but this is likely to change in the future because of factors such as globalization and price.

First, the world economy is becoming more interconnected. In the past, there were mostly only Japanese products available on store shelves, but shoppers now have many more options. Although Japanese products are known for their high quality, foreign countries are now developing various technologies, which means imported goods are becoming as good as or better than Japanese products.

Price will also cause consumers to buy more imported products. Lower wages in developing countries mean these countries can produce goods more cheaply. Furthermore, lower shipping costs mean imported goods will become more and more attractive.

Throughout the world, globalization and price consciousness are affecting consumer decisions about what to buy, and this trend also seems likely to grow in Japan in the future.
