Although Japan is a world leader in education, it needs to make improvements in terms of globalization and the pressure put on students.
To meet the needs of today's global society, high schools need to focus more on spoken and written English. Although progress has been made by employing foreign teachers, more needs to be done to build students' communication skills. This could be accomplished through greater emphasis on things like presentations, class participation, and written reports.
In addition, the university entrance system is extremely stressful. Because of the intense competition, students spend endless hours preparing for exams. If other criteria were used, such as admissions essays and community service, there would be less pressure. Moreover, focusing less on exam preparation would allow schools to teach things that are more interesting and practical.
In order to maintain its academic excellence, Japan needs to globalize and lessen pressure on students.
