This trend is worrying, however, as civilization cannot rely on these fuels in perpetuity, and the carbon dioxide emissions from their ongoing use impede progress in the fight against climate change. To tackle this issue, scientists have conceived a solution that yields carbon-neutral biofuel from waste materials. Nevertheless, as things stand, governments are apprehensive about investing in biofuel because of sluggish progress in upscaling its production sufficiently to enable its broad implementation as an alternative fuel.

There are myriad reasons, but some of the most important include market size, the cost of goods, and international exchange of ideas. First, free trade agreements allow companies access to a larger market. By making it easier for businesses to operate internationally, these agreements can give companies access to more resources and a larger customer base. This, in turn, can create more jobs and bolster economic growth. Second, free trade agreements can increase local consumption. When businesses can source materials more cheaply, they can offer their products and services at a lower cost to consumers. Supplying products at more affordable prices has the benefit of encouraging consumers to buy more. This kind of increase in consumption is a hallmark of a burgeoning economy. Finally, free trade agreements increase businesses' exposure to novel concepts. In particular, introducing management styles and other business practices used in developed countries can be a boon to developing countries. By implementing cutting-edge business theory, businesses there will become more profitable, and the economy will flourish. In conclusion, I believe that the many advantages of free trade agreements make them a powerful tool for promoting economic growth. Whether by enabling greater access to markets, promoting local consumption, or sharing knowledge, free trade agreements can provide significant benefits for countries that participate in them.
